Oleomargarine—How Made.
In looking up the history of oleomargarine, it is found to have been manufactured many years since in Paris, called "margarine moules," as manufactured by a French chemist, M. Meke Mourié, who surmised that the formation of butter contained in milk is due to the absorption of fat contained in the animal tissues, and thus he was led to experiment on the solidifying of animal fat. The process he adopted consisted in boiling finely minced beef suet with water, carbonate of potash and fresh sheep's stomachs cut up in small pieces. The mixture he raised to a temperature of 45 degrees C. (113 degrees F.). The influence of the presence of the animal's stomach with the heat separated the fat from the cellular tissue; the fat then removed the fatty matter and submitted it, when cool, to powerful hydraulic pressure, separating it into stearine and oleomargarine, which was, he used alone for making butter. Oleins about the proportion of ten pounds with four parts of milk and three parts of water were placed in a churn, to which a small quantity of soda was added for coloring, and the whole churned together. The compound, when well washed, resembling butter. He called this compound "oleomargarine," from the old idea, now disproved, that a fat margaric existed in butter and suet. "Oleo" is manufactured as from one fifth to one third the cost of butter. Butter of good quality is the most digestible form of fat, while in flour it is so delicate and little pronounced that it is always agreeable to the palate. It is a substance that affords great scope for adulteration, and its composition makes accurate detection of certain foreign substances a matter of labor cumbersome with difficulty. Other animal fat, such as lard, beef and mutton drippings or suet, and tallow, with certain vegetable fats, are the chief adulterants. Such adulterations may be suspected by their characteristic smell and detected by their different melting points, by microscopic examination and by their chemical solutions.—N. Y. Shipping List.

PRELUDE WORDS.—Why be so severe in dealing with the faults of those at home while we excuse anything friends or acquaintances may do? The laws of politeness should be binding at home as well as abroad. We enjoy seeing our husbands and wives polite to our neighbors, only let us be sure to practice our good manners at home. There are husbands who would listen to assure a neighbor's wife who had, in her haste, burned her biscuits, that they "greatly enjoyed them when they were so nice and brown," who would never think their own wives need the same consideration. No man can be a gentleman, though ever so genial abroad, who is a tyrant or a habitual fault finder at home; and so women is a real lady who is not a lady at home in her morning wrapper, as well as in silk in her neighbor's parlor. One member of a family who begins the day with frothy words and harsh tones, is generally enough to spoil the happiness and temper of the whole for the day. Not all who hear the impatient word give the angry answer, for many choose to suffer in silence; but every such word makes somebody's heart sore; and, as a rule, it is somebody whom we love and would do any thing for, except to keep back the unkind, sarcastic word. Then do not let us make ourselves and others miserable by being fault finders at home.
